

The Long and Winding Road to Equal Pay

Slower Progress and Substantial Differences Among States Mark the 1990s

Highlights for Working Women in Georgia

- Working women in Georgia are farther along the road to equal pay than women in many states; in 2000, Georgia's working women earned 80.7 percent as much per hour as men, while nationwide women earned only 77.6 percent as much per hour as men. Georgia ranked 10th among all states in equal pay.
- The rate of progress in closing Georgia's hourly wage gap was slower than average in the 1990s. Georgia ranked 47th among all states in progress in closing the hourly wage gap.
- Slower wage growth for men contributed to the closing of the gap—wages for men in Georgia grew by 7.9 percent over the decade, compared with 10.3 percent wage growth for women.
- At the current rate of change, working women in Georgia—as well as working women nationwide—won't have equal pay until after 2050.
