

The Long and Winding Road to Equal Pay

Slower Progress and Substantial Differences Among States Mark the 1990s

Highlights for Working Women in Maine

- Working women in Maine are farther along the road to equal pay than women in many states; in 2000, Maine's working women earned 81.3 percent as much per hour as men, while nationwide women earned only 77.6 percent as much per hour as men. Maine ranked seventh among all states in equal pay.
- The rate of progress in closing Maine's hourly wage gap was better than average in the 1990s. Maine ranked 22nd among all states in progress in closing the hourly wage gap.
- Slow wage growth for men contributed to the closing of the gap—wages for men in Maine grew by only 0.2 percent over the decade, compared with 7.7 percent wage growth for women.
- At the current rate of change, working women in Maine won't have equal pay until 2030. Nationwide, women won't achieve equal pay until after 2050.
