

The Long and Winding Road to Equal Pay

Slower Progress and Substantial Differences Among States Mark the 1990s

Highlights for Working Women in Missouri

- Working women in Missouri are farther along the road to equal pay than women in many states; in 2000, Missouri's working women earned 79.1 percent as much per hour as men, while nationwide women earned only 77.6 percent as much per hour as men. Missouri ranked 18th among all states in equal pay.
- The rate of progress in closing Missouri's hourly wage gap was better than average in the 1990s. Missouri ranked 12th among all states in progress in closing the hourly wage gap.
- Slower wage growth for men contributed to the closing of the gap—wages for men in Missouri grew by 11.6 percent over the decade, compared with 22.3 percent wage growth for women.
- At the current rate of change, working women in Missouri won't have equal pay until 2026. Nationwide, women won't achieve equal pay until after 2050.
